A Solitary: Part Eight - Common Raccoon (Procyon lotor)

Published on 2nd March 2012 by Jason Dunn

Exploration from a tree of many years with a big hole in it turned to surprise that I was not alone. Peering out from the hole was a pair of eyes, a nose and a set of whiskers. Common Raccoon (Procyon lotor) was the first mammal I had seen in my garden.

THE INITIAL ENCOUNTER

The initial encounter was a surprise. I was walking around the garden with my camera and video rig. I cannot imagine what it was I was doing that would cause the raccoon to be out in the daylight, but I was pleased that it was. I was also pleased that it was not a rat.

The raccoon was curious about my presence and I was curious about its presence
